KRG hails Marathon deal

Erbil, Kurdistan - Iraq (KRG.org) - Kurdistan Regional Government (KRG) Minister of Natural Resources Ashti Hawrami has welcomed Marathon Oil Corporation's entry into the Kurdistan Region oil and gas sector, saying that such an experienced company will be "a valuable partner in developing the resources of our Region to the maximum benefit of the people of Kurdistan and Iraq, in line with our Constitutional obligations".

Marathon, which is based in Houston in the United States, has acquired operating positions in four exploration blocks in the Kurdistan Region. Under production sharing contracts, the company has taken an 80 percent share in the Harir and Safeen blocks, northeast of Erbil. The KRG, through a public company, retains a fully carried 20 percent interest in both areas. Northwest of Erbil, Marathon has also acquired a 25 percent working interest in Sarsang block and 20 percent in the Atrush block. Marathon will open an office in the Kurdistan Region.

"The KRG is pleased that Marathon, one of the most prominent and well-respected oil companies in the United States, will soon be working in the Kurdistan Region, providing a vital contribution to the future wealth of the Kurdistan Region and Iraq," Dr Hawrami said. "It presents an opportunity to build on the success we have already achieved in the hydrocarbons sector."

Dr Hawrami predicted that more American companies would follow Marathon into the Kurdistan Region in the near future in the energy and other sectors. "The Kurdistan Region is a vibrant place to do business and it is a stepping stone for the rest of Iraq," he said. "Companies such as Marathon bring with them advanced technologies and skills that will help build a modern, dynamic and sustainable oil and gas sector for Kurdistan and Iraq."

President Barzani Receives High-Level U.S. Delegation

Erbil, Kurdistan Region, Iraq (KRP.org) – Kurdistan Region President Masoud Barzani today held talks with Antony J. Blinken, National Security Advisor to US Vice President Biden to discuss the latest efforts to form the next Iraqi government.

Mr. Blinken, accompanied by James Jeffrey the US Ambassador to Iraq and General Loyd Austin the Commanding General of the United States Forces in Iraq, said that President Obama once again reiterates the US government's "unshakable commitment to the security of the Kurdistan Region and support for the Kurdish people", adding that in recent months they have demonstrated this commitment by the decision to open a consulate in Erbil and with the training and support that the US military is providing for the Peshmerga forces.

On the position of the US government to the formation of a new government, Mr. Blinken said that he is here on behalf of President Obama and Vice President Biden to find out about the status of talks for the formation of the next government.

He added that his country has no preferred candidate for the post of Prime Minister, and shares President Barzani's view that the important thing is to come up with a truly inclusive government where no community is marginalized. He voiced his support for President Barzani's initiative for a multilateral meeting between the main blocs as an attempt to end the political deadlock.

President Barzani said he is pleased and thanked President Obama for reaffirming US commitments to support the Kurdistan Region.

On the status of government formation talks, the President said that the excessive delay on government formation is very embarrassing. "We are pleased to have demonstrated our commitment to the unity of Iraq, contrary to some critics who accuse us of having separatist ambitions. In fact, we could have allied with either major bloc and would have created a divided nation but we have chosen not to. We are for a truly inclusive and representative government where no community is marginalized," said President Barzani, reiterating his belief that agreeing on more pressing issues like power-sharing and distribution of powers are far more important than bickering about posts.

President Barzani said that a multilateral meeting of the four main winning blocs will take place in Erbil today, to be followed by a meeting between the leaders of these blocs soon, in an effort to reach an agreement on the form of the next government.

LA Times interview with President Barzani

In a Q&A with Kurdistan Region President Masoud Barzani, he discusses the deal on forming a new government in which he played a crucial role and what lies ahead for Kurdistan and for Iraq as a whole.

By Ned Parker

Reporting from Baghdad — Massoud Barzani, president of the Kurdistan regional government in northern Iraq, was feeling triumphant. The onetime Kurdish fighter against Saddam Hussein's regime had hosted three days of talks and pushed through a deal Wednesday meant to end Iraq's eight-month political stalemate and form a stable government that could rule until elections planned for 2014. Even if the arrangement breaks down before a full government is seated — the secular Iraqiya bloc walked out of a parliamentary session Thursday, suggesting the difficult road ahead — Barzani will be remembered for his efforts to end the impasse. In an interview Thursday with The Times, Barzani made clear his insistence that the power-sharing agreement be honored by all sides, including by Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, who retains his post under the deal despite the fears of many that he is seeking to monopolize power.

Q: Did you expect the deal last night on naming a government?

I had hoped we would succeed in our efforts. In fact, the developments that happened last night were ... beyond my expectations.

Q: How long did you think it would take?

I expected some of the key issues would not be sorted out or finalized decisively. The good thing was last night and the previous night some of these key issues were sorted out.

Q: Which issues are settled now clearly, with no ambiguity?

There are a number of very complicated issues that have been there for five or six years and have not been sorted out: the issue of accountability and justice, the issue of balance, the issue of consensus, the issue of partnership in the government, the issue of the three presidencies. ... These had all become problems, but it was good we were able to sort them out.

Is it fair to say that you and the Kurdistan Alliance were the kingmakers of Iraqi politics, that there is a government today because of the Kurdistan Alliance?

Our fate and destiny is with that of Iraq. The Kurdistan region is part of Iraq. It doesn't work for us if we say let's do well in Kurdistan and let what happens in Baghdad happen. That's not a true approach, and that's not a sound policy. ... Therefore, we tried seriously to solve the problems in Baghdad and elsewhere in Iraq together. And, of course, we do not want to exploit our position and our situation in a way to gain achievements for the Kurds alone. We want to gain achievements for the Kurds and Kurdistan region, but also for all of Iraq. And we feel proud that the Kurds have been able to play this role.

Q: What was a key moment in the negotiations that helped to convince Iraqiya [which won the largest number of parliamentary seats in March elections but could not leverage that to gain the prime minister post] to join?

There was a lot of sensitivity and lack of trust or mistrust among many of the colleagues. So we did our best either to eliminate the lack of trust ...or at least to minimize it. ... We played and acted as guarantors so that no sides will step back from the pledges that they have made.

Q: Was there a key meeting with [Iraqiya leader Iyad] Allawi and Maliki in the last days that tipped the balance?

I have spent time talking to them one on one and privately, and I felt there was a desire from both to get out of the crisis. ... Maybe each saw the situation a different way, each had a fear in a way, and we tried to allay the fears, and also to work together.

Q: You warned in early 2009 that Maliki risked drifting toward authoritarianism and not honoring his commitment and friendship to the Kurds. What restored your confidence in Maliki, so that you could do business with him again?

There is no doubt that the last four years were a rich experience for us, for Prime Minister Maliki, for [Maliki's] Dawa party, for our party and for all the other parties involved in the political process. So a fact was known to all of us, to everyone, that with confrontation and challenges the situation in Iraq will deteriorate. We have to find common ground, and common points that bring us together and we have to work together.

Q: What gives you confidence that the prime minister has learned as well? Is it his acceptance of Iraqi Kurdistan's position papers [19 points that look to limit the powers of the prime minister's office, to promote power-sharing and to resolve outstanding issues regarding Iraqi Kurdistan's semi-autonomy]?

A number of reasons: our conversation with him, the 19-point paper, the program or agenda of the government, the bylaws and statutes of the council of ministers, the bylaws of the parliament, the practices of the parliament, the basis of partnership, the balance of governance. So these all make sure the process goes the right way.

Q: Do you want US [military] forces to stay in Iraq after 2011, when the country's current security agreement expires? Is that important for Iraqi Kurdistan?

Of course, this issue has to be studied thoroughly, and based on the requirements of the circumstances on that day after. When the time has come, based on that, the federal government has to decide upon it. I've always stated that we are for friendly and continued relations with the United States, but not necessarily that that relationship is confined only to the presence of their troops on the ground.

Q: So it is not as crucial an issue as it was in the past when you had said you wanted US bases in the north.

The crucial point is for the relationship to continue. Instead of having combat troops, we could have experts to train the Iraqi forces, so the relationship could change, and the same with the [Kurdish] peshmerga forces — to train the [Kurdish] forces.

Q: Do you want that personally as the head of the Kurdistan regional government?

I certainly would welcome and like our forces to be trained, to be equipped and to be helped.
